Depends what you mean.

Nose can't really be shortened.

Bimax with anterior maxillary impaction and CCW rotation to reduce length of the maxilla..

Lip lift for the soft tissue.

Other than widening the midface, there are a couple of approaches with osteotomies, but for most people will not be worth it.

LeFort II's and III's may not shorten the vertical length of the maxilla, but if you have "downward growth" the maxilla may not only be moved forward but with a counterclockwise rotation (from the subjects right side) of the occlusal curve of spee. This maneuver creates a slightly steeper forward downslope of the midface which makes it appear shorter. Of course, the mandible will have to be moved with it to maintain a good bite but this CCW of the mandible tends to be pleasing as well.

Further there is a modified LeFort I where two cuts are made instead of one. The wedge inbetween these two cuts is removed and basically a maxillary wedge resection, a true vertical shorting of the maxilla. In this case the mandible will probably require advancement or curve of spee rotation so the occlusal plane comes together nicely as well.

Right, good point. You can reduce the cartilage so the tip tilts more upwards which may make the nose appear shorter. But the base of the nose would still be the same so it doesn't really alter absolute mid face length.

There's nothing you can really do. Some say adding width to you jaw helps take away focus but honestly I'm not convinced it helps, and might mess up your harmony in other ways. I'd love to see examples of people trying it out though.

Just lay down and rot.
